Roman Britain. According to Hugh Davies in Roman Roads in Britain (Shire Archaeology, 2008), the Romans began building a network of roads in Britain “almost as soon as they arrived” (p. 6). What we know about Roman roads are based on modern archaeological evidence and investigation, as there are few

Unfortunately, there is little hard evidence to go on beyond the 6 000 miles or so of physical roads that the Romans left behind in Britain. THE ROMAN NETWORK. The roads of the Romans set the pattern for today's A-road network, radiating from London ( Londinium) to all parts of Britain with a few roads cutting across country. We do not know whether these roads had Roman names, so we rely on names given them later by the Anglo-Saxons.

The Roman roads of Great Britain were highways of the Roman Empire during the four centuries that Britannia was a Roman province. During the four centuries of Roman occupation, between AD 43 and approximately 410, the Roman Army constructed and maintained 2,000 miles of paved trunk roads throughout those parts of Britain they controlled.

The next chapter argues that the Roman road network determined the location of battles throughout Britain's later history. It consists of not much more than a list of brief descriptions of battles and which road in the numbering used by Margary's survey dating from the 1960's and 1970's the battle is supposed to have taken place near.
